October Luncheon

We want to thank Celia Hammond of Sebesta Bloomberg & Associates for joining us to discuss Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design specifically as it involves existing buildings.

The LEED program was created to facilitate positive results for the environment, occupant health and financial return through a whole-building, integrated design process. LEED's other objective was to provide an industry standard for measuring and defining "green" improvements in an effort to prevent false or exaggerated

"greenwashing" claims. LEED for existing buildings focuses on improving building performance and helping building owners to reduce the environmental impacts of their facilities.

By fine tuning operating practices, improving mechanical efficiencies and coordinating with owners, tenants and vendors to work together, practical cost saving and environmentally sustainable improvements can be made to existing buildings. It just takes a willingness to do so. For more information and to discuss what steps you can take to improve your buildings environmental impact and even save money in the process, please contact Celia at 475-0980.
